

The new building: A challenge for the Administration

The administration's close involvement with students and faculty resulted in a conducive learning atmosphere. Open to new ideas, the administration also suggested practical innovations for the betterment of the school to students and faculty through various committees. From this grew a more progressive educational system in which students shouldered much of the responsibility for their growth in learning and working at SPFHS.

New programs were instituted, the most significant being the independent study program which encouraged students to investigate areas of study on their own. This concept of learning was greatly advanced by the facilities provided in the new addition.

Long hours of planning, tedious months of organizing and slow years of building made January 10, 1971, a very gratifying and fulfilling day for the administration and the community as well. On this day the addition to SPFHS was officially dedicated to Dr. Perry H. Tyson, principal, whose dreams of such an educational advancement for the students in Scotch Plains and Fanwood were materialized in this building.
