HOME ECONOMICS

An increased enrollment in the Home Economics Department signified the Department's success in stimulating student interest. Corresponding to society's changing attitude toward sex roles, the number of boys involved in Home Economic courses was greater than in any previous year. A lack of funds and a greater student enrollment caused class size to be enlarged and certain courses to be offered during only one semester. These conflicts did not influence the faculty's belief that the 1975-1976 school year was replete with beneficial results.
