Tap tap tap tap tap . . . Typists are hard at work, training to enter a multitude of business-related fields. To give students an idea of how an office is run, teachers in the Business department have set up "office simulations." The instructors in this department also added a new course this year — Consumer Education, which is an interdisciplinary course with the Home Economics department.

For the student who wishes to acquire skills on-the-job, the department offers Cooperative Office Education and Distributive Education Programs. Accountants, stenographers, bookkeepers, secretaries, and computer programmers of the future find their start in the courses of the Business department.
