

Flirting

Flirt — (v.) to play at love in a non-serious manner.

The students at SPFHS work hard at all their subjects. Some are better at English and others at science, but there's one subject that everyone has excelled in — flirting! Although English and science are practiced in certain areas, flirting knows no bounds. Signs of the flirting game can be seen everywhere. A popular tactic is to laugh heartily at every comment a person makes, even though there is no apparent humor. Another tactic is to give a solid friendship hug with the intention of meaning more than just friendship. Some may even resort to the "May I borrow your jacket?" approach.

So what is this flirting game all about? Some may describe it as a natural behavior, others may call it an art form, and some may even claim to be unaware that they practice it. Students participate in the game of "playing at love" to let someone know they are interested, to enjoy the attention, or sometimes to just play with a person's mind. Regardless of the definition or intention, Spiffy High students have definitely perfected the flirting game. If only we could perfect our Algebra skills as well.
